

Finding the conversion story a clinic didn't know it had

A homepage concept for a fictional family-owned physical therapy clinic, demonstrating the same content-first conversion approach outside legal — and how one under-used fact can restructure an entire page.

THE DESIGN BRIEF

Riverbend Physical Therapy & Sports Medicine (fictional): a family-owned clinic with two Richmond-area locations, competing against corporate chains. Its therapists are Direct Access Certified — meaning patients can start treatment without a physician referral. On most clinic sites, that fact appears once, mid-page, in body text.

The challenge given to the design: rebuild the page around that single patient-acquisition message, make "independent, not a chain" tangible rather than sentimental, and keep every scroll depth one click from an appointment.

• No physician referral needed — Direct Access Certified

Start getting better this week, not after your next referral.

We're a family-owned private physical therapy clinic — not a chain. Every session is one-on-one, evidence-based, and tailored to you. And because our therapists are Direct Access Certified, you can be evaluated without a prescription.

OUR APPROACH

Evidence-based treatment, tailored to YOU

That phrase is on our door for a reason. Every plan of care starts with the current research and ends with your specific goals — your sport, your job, your life. No cookie-cutter protocols, no getting handed off to a rotating cast of providers.

We're independently owned, which means treatment decisions are made by your therapist — not a corporate productivity target.

DESIGN CONCEPT — RIVERBEND PHYSICAL THERAPY IS A FICTIONAL CLINIC CREATED FOR PORTFOLIO DEMONSTRATION

This page is a design exercise. The clinic, addresses, and phone numbers are fictional; any resemblance to a real business is coincidental. Nothing here constitutes medical advice.

The full homepage concept: Direct Access as the headline promise, a "start today" card with both locations, and an appointment path repeated at every scroll depth.

Four decisions that do the selling

i.

Lead with the strongest fact

"No referral needed" is the hero chip, the headline ("Start getting better this week, not after your next referral"), a three-step explainer, and the first FAQ. One fact, four reinforcements.

ii.

Independent vs. chain, made tangible

"Family owned" is an abstraction until you explain what it buys the patient: one-on-one sessions and treatment decisions made by the therapist, not a corporate productivity target. The approach section says exactly that.

iii.

Two locations, zero friction

Both locations with phone numbers appear in the topbar, the hero card, a dedicated section, and the form's location selector — so no patient ever hunts for the number to call.

iv.

Calm, clinical, trustworthy

Healthcare design earns trust through clarity: a soft porcelain ground, one confident blue, serif headlines for warmth, and generous whitespace. No stock-photo heroes, no text fighting a busy background.

SCOPE

Homepage concept: design system, typography, palette, nine content sections including a no-JavaScript FAQ accordion, responsive to mobile.

STACK

Hand-coded HTML/CSS with vanilla JS enhancements — the same lightweight approach I bring to custom Gutenberg/ACF WordPress themes.

CONTENT

All copy, branding, and business details are original fiction written for this exercise. No real clinic's content, design, or identity was used.

DESIGN CONCEPT — FICTIONAL BUSINESS

This case study is a self-initiated design exercise. Riverbend Physical Therapy is a fictional clinic created for portfolio demonstration; any resemblance to a real business is coincidental.
